| There are many different stereotypes that exist for African-Americans; some stereotypes portray them as aggressive, hostile or criminal. | African-Americans are often stereotyped as aggressive, hostile or criminal. |
In an article by Hartmann & Klimmt (2006), the article looked at why there is a gender gap in computer game playing, and why women do not have the same motivation to play video games as men. Hartmann & Klimmt (2006) examined gender differences in computer and video game playing.
However, there are many aspects that are advocated by both sides that deserve to be examined further.

Many issues deserve further examination.
Further research shows that there might be other factors in play that could explain this phenomenon among college students in college environments. In Sociologist Kathleen A. Bogle's (2008) novel, Hooking Up: Sex, Dating, and Relationships on Campus, she argues that college life itself promotes casual relationships among students on campus.

Other factors could explain this phenomenon among college students. Bogle (2008) argued that college life promoted casual relationships.
| Just as there may be differing views on self body image in African American women and their counterparts, there should also exist differences in African American and Caucasian male ideals for the body image of women. | Just as women’s body images differ by race, so too do males’. |